

TROUNCING TRADUCERS.

The manner in which Mr. John Mackay administered a rebuke to his former broker, Bonyng, ought to be regarded as a model for future generations. For years there has been bad blood between the two families arising from some sort of social rivalry.

The Bonyngs were trying to get into English society and the success of the Mackays in that direction seems to have vulgarly speaking, stuck in the Bonyngs collar.

For years past little mean allusions to Mrs. Mackay have been floating about the press, and notably in the columns of the New York Truth, a paper published by David Dalzelle, a man who formerly published the Mail, in San Francisco.

Dalzelle's stock in trade has consisted in pestiferous annoyance of society people, with a view of securing hush money to cease his work and he has the reputation of continuing his waspish attacks after securing the money.

It was through the columns of this irresponsible journal that Bonyng directed his attacks on the Mackays. From this paper the articles were copied in London papers and became a source of irritating annoyance to Mr. Mackay's family. They were not such charges that one could bring the author into Court on.

They would never have been given a moment's consideration in America but they would be regarded more seriously in England where the conditions of society and social environments differ.

After some years of patient endurance of these cowardly stabblings at his family Mr. Mackay met the instigator and pounded his head in a manner which will probably for many years to come render Mr. Bonyng's occupation as an international social gossip a somewhat unsatisfactory and profitless amusement.

The insinuations of Bonyng, that Mr. Mackay has pursued him with anonymous pamphlets, is too ridiculous for serious consideration.

Any man who had even the most casual acquaintance with Mr. Mackay knows that the man who would come to him and even suggest such a cowardly method of warfare, would be summarily dismissed and be in big luck if he were not kicked down stairs.

News of the death of Secretary Windom startled Wall Street. The only appreciable financial effect, however, was a fall in the price of silver bullion, the London price declining from 47½ pence to 46½ and in New York declining accordingly. His death is looked upon by the silver men here as rendering the passage of any silver bill this session unlikely. The majority of financiers are of the opinion that Mr. Windom's successor will undoubtedly be a man who will carry out the policy of the dead Secretary which, it was believed, was in all respects in accord with the ideas of the President. There is much discussion as to his probable successor but the only names so far mentioned are those of Senators Allison and Spooner.

COAST NEWS.
